Project # 2 (CPRS) Full Narrative:

In contrast to other mental health professionals, peer specialists routinely disclose aspects of their illness and share their paths to recovery. They offer practical advice around managing symptoms, navigating complex service systems, living in poverty, and dealing with discrimination (Bellamy, Rowe, Benedict, & Davidson, 2012; Solomon, 2004). They serve as role models, demonstrating to patients with mental health conditions, their family members, and their clinicians that recovery is possible. Overall, patients can relate to peer specialists, and come to believe they can achieve similar recovery goals.

Peer specialists acknowledge and combat issues of stigma and discrimination (Corrigan & Watson, 2002) which can reduce self-stigmatization and improve quality of life (Corrigan et al., 2010). Peer specialists offer empathy and acceptance (Bellamy et al., 2012; Davidson, Bellamy, Guy, & Miller, 2012; Mead & MacNeil, 2006). In their roles in mental health programs, they can offer structured opportunities to help patients integrate and participate in community living.

Peer recovery specialists or individuals with lived mental health experience are trained and employed to work in clinical organizations and other settings: mental health and health care systems hire people with lived mental health experiences to provide support to people with mental illnesses and/or in primary care medical settings and addiction treatment clinics. Free clinics, street outreach (harm reduction programs), and adult detention centers, as well as hospitals are increasingly incorporating peers to bring their beneficial impact on recovery to highly vulnerable underserved populations.
